THE YOUNG MAN AND THE DOG SISTERS

There was a village. And there there lived a young man who did not want to marry. All the women tried to get him, but he just sat back in the middle of the house. There were some women who had a big house near the kashim; the whole house was full of women. Those women washed their hair, and dressed in their fine parkas. Then they put food in fine bowls, and took it inside to the one who would not marry. One of the women went in carrying the bowl.

The first woman went in, carrying the bowl. She took it up to him and held it out. Then he snatched the bowl from her and threw it at her, and the food fell all over her. The bowl flew up in the air and fell on the ground. The woman picked up all the scattered food and went out crying. Meanwhile, all the other women stayed in the entryway, holding their bowls. One by one they went in to him, but it was no use. The same thing happened to them; he threw all those bowls back at them. They all went out crying. Finally they went back into their houses. The young man thought, "Whenever they treat me that way, it just makes my head ache. Why would I ever live with them? If I wanted to, I would already have married them." Then all the others in the kashim left, and he alone remained there. Finally he went out, and went to his mother's house. When he went in, he looked around. There were buckets and bowls, all full of water. Apparently those young women had brought the water for the young man's mother. They would do anything for her in the hope that she would give them her son. So the young man said to his mother, "I want some water." And his mother replied, "If you want water, drink some of that there." He went to it and said, "Who brought this here?" "Why, your little cousins brought it for me," she said. "Why have they brought water for you?" he asked. "It's not their water that I want to drink. Tell them not to get water for me any more." And then he threw out the water, he threw it over the bank, bowls and all. "Where is the water you brought?" he asked his mother. "Right down here," she said. "Did you really get that?" he said. "Indeed, I got it today with great effort," she said. And so he drank it. Then she fed him, and he ate. "I wonder," said his mother, "when you are going to get helpers for me? Alas, my strength is failing me." "What are you bothering me about?" he said. "I've made up my mind, and that's the way I am. You bother me," he said.

Then he went out. He went into the kashim and lay down. In the early morning he awoke. He dressed for the trail, to hunt caribou. He killed some caribou, and then he went back. He went into his mother's house. She gave him food and he ate. After he ate, he went into the kashim and sat back down in his accustomed place. Then the women who lived nearby washed their hair and dressed in pretty clothes. They put food in bowls, and took it in to the young man. The first one went in to him and stopped in front of him with the bowl. And just as before, he grabbed it from her and threw it back at her. Crying, she picked it up. All the rest of them did the same, but he did not accept a bowl from anyone, and so they went back out. As they left, he said to them, "I don't want you to do this for me."

Finally summer came. The fish were about to start running. So the young man went in his canoe to get material for a fishtrap. He started off downriver, and canoed downriver. He looked over at the shore. As he looked, he saw a big drift-log lying on the shore. It was split. So he went ashore. He cut it in half with his stone axe. He started to split it, then he split it in two. Then he took a rest. He looked at its roots, and behold, there were two masks hanging on them, two wretched little masks. The young man thought, "Why, look at that!" So he went over to it and was about to take it in his hand. At that moment, the woody root vanished.

Then he felt a strong desire to go up the bank, so he did. There at his feet was a trail, and he went down the trail. Up the bank stood a poor little house. He went toward it and went to its door. There on each side of the doorway hung the two little masks, the same ones that had been hanging on the root below. "I think I'll go in," he thought, and he went in, even though the house was a very poor and wretched one.

He looked across the room, and there was someone scowling at him. He looked the other way, and there was someone growling at him. They were two wretched, withered old women wearing dirty fishskin parkas. Their mittens, and their moccasins, and their parkas were all made of fishskin. They wore no fur. There was nothing in the house but dirt. There was no clothing. So the man went to the back of the house and sat down. There were no bowls either. "What a poor place I have come to," he thought. And then they spoke to him from over in the corner. "What is he doing over there?" they said. "You have come to us because of our wisdom," they told him. "Now you won't get away from us." Then they took the cover off the smokehole and started a fire. They put an earthen bowl by the fire and put things in it. After they had the fire going, they put the curtain back on. Then they began to eat. They tossed him some food in a wooden ladle. "Come on, eat it, eat it," they said. "No, I won't eat," he said. "Come on, you are that bad yourself, you should eat it. What else should you eat?" they said. "My mother didn't raise me on such bad stuff as this," he said. It was boiled salmon tails and boiled fins all mixed with dirt. "I might just as well die here," he thought. That's all they said to him, and there he stayed.

Then the women at whose house he had arrived got ready for bed. The one who slept across the house rolled up her mat, and the one who slept across from her went to the man. "Come, come here beside us," they said to him. "Oh no, I won't go over by you," he said. Then suddenly they ran at him. They grabbed him and threw him down beside them. They tickled him until he began to scream. Finally he was in great pain all over from their scratching. He fell asleep. Then he awoke. It had been light for some time, and the women were gone. He got up and started to go out, but he could not, for the doorway was closed. He pushed outward on it with all his strength, but he could not move it. It was fastened tightly up above. Finally he sat back down. He looked around behind him. It was dark back there. He looked carefully, and there he saw a bunch of human bones. He thought about it. "This is what my mother warned me about, and it makes no difference what happens to me now," he thought. "I just wanted my own way and wouldn't take advice." And there he sat. It became dusk. From over there, there was the sound of something falling heavily. The earth shook. Then the door fell open. It seems they had closed it with a big root. The two of them came in, carrying dog-salmon tails. Then they made a fire and began to boil the dog-salmon tails. Once again they threw them at him in a wooden spoon. "Am I supposed to eat this rotten stuff? Is that how you treat me?" he said to them. "Why don't you eat this nice stuff?" they said to him. But he did not eat it. He just sat there. "It will be long enough that you sit there, you who speak that way," they said. "Was it because I told you I was hungry that you gave me this to eat?" he said to them.

So they got ready for bed again. Then, as they had done the day before, they threw him down beside themselves. Again they tickled him. Finally he was bloody all over. He stayed awake, but there was no way for him to get out. The opening was closed up above again. He sat there all the next day; it had now been three days that he had gone without food and water. Then overhead there was a jarring sound, and the top covering slid aside, the root covering. Then someone stuck her head down through the hole. It was a very pretty woman wearing a marten-skin parka. And she said, "Are you still alive?" "Yes," he said. "I thought perhaps you were dead already," she said. "I thought you might have eaten their food." "No," he said. "Really, if you had eaten their food, you would not have been seen again alive," she said. "It is because they did not want to give you up that you have survived this long. They made you sleep for four days because they didn't want to give you up. And because I do not want to give up your life, I'm saying this to you." Then she handed down a little bowl of water to him. "Drink this," she said. Then she drew it back up. She handed a little sliced meat and fat down to him too. "Revive yourself with this," she said. "When they come back, they will ask you if you have been talking to anyone. Tell them that there is no one but mice in this house to talk to. And then say to them, 'When my dear younger sister and I went around Tigitr'ighan no', we sucked on soft berries'," she said. "Now it is about time for that to happen," she said, "so I will leave." Then she closed the hole again with the big root, turned around, and disappeared. There the man sat. Then the earth seemed to shake, and the two old women came in, carrying salmon tails. Then they said to him, "It seems someone has been talking with you." "What? How could I have been talking with anyone when I only stay here?" he said. "Nevertheless, it sounded like you were talking to somebody," they said. "Well, you good-for-nothings, all I said was 'leave me alone!'" he said. "Oh," they said. Then they opened the curtain, built a fire, and set the pot by the fire. Then they closed the curtain and ate. Once again they threw food at him in the wooden spoon. "I won't eat," he said. And then he said to them, "When my dear younger sister and I went around Tigitr'ighan no', we sucked soft berries." "Now where did you learn what you said?" they said. They were angry, those women. They got ready for bed, and this time they almost killed the young man. He was covered with blood. And then he fell asleep. Finally he awoke, and they were gone. He was nothing but skin and bones. He got up, but he had no strength. He spent the day. Then there was a noise overhead, and someone stuck her head in through the opening. It was the same woman he had spoken with the day before. "Are you still alive?" she said. "Yes," he said. "Now," she told him, "eat the berries that they bring to you. And after you have eaten them, say this to them: 'These Tigitr'ighan no' berries that I am eating, I wish I could have some more tomorrow evening.' Tell them that. Now there is barely one more day that they will spare you alive. Tomorrow evening they are going to kill you," she said. Then she handed down the little water bowl to him, and a little meat and fat. "This is what they always do," she said. "They catch men, and they always kill them. They keep some of them for two days. But since they really don't want to give up your life, they have let you stay here sleeping for four days. Now I'll go," she said, and she was gone.

The man sat there. When it grew dark, the two old women returned, bringing something in a bowl. Again they made a fire and closed the curtain. They began to eat. They gave him those berries, and he ate them. Finally, when he had eaten the contents, he gave them back the bowl. "Now, tomorrow evening, I wish I could have some Tigitr'ighan no' whitefish," he said. When he said that to them, they got angry and jerked their bodies. Then they got ready for bed. That time they almost killed him. He went to sleep, and when he awoke, they were gone. Again he heard a noise, and it was the woman again. "This evening they will surely kill you," she said. "Because I am sorry for you, I will save you. Would I do for anyone else what I do for you? I am doing this for my own sake," she said. Then she reached down to him. She grasped his hand and pulled him up. Then she took him around the waist and whirled around. He seemed to hear the noise of a drum.

As he heard the noise, it seemed as if he had landed somewhere else. When he could see, the sun was shining. He looked around, and there was a lot of meat there. The woman came over to him. There was a pond with a village at the end of it, and he and the woman went to the village. There was a medium-sized baidarka lying overturned. Then she undressed him and bathed him, and dressed him in new clothing.

When it became dusk, the two old women came back home. They went in the house and looked for him, but he was gone. They began to search for him. "You ought to have stayed with him," they told each other. Each one said that the other should have stayed. They burst out crying. They fought with each other until they were both covered with blood, wanting that man. Then one of them went downriver and the other went upriver to search for him. They agreed with each other: "You will camp out two days, and so will I. And if we find him, after two days we'll meet again." Then they both went in different directions. But he wasn't there.

Finally, after four days, they met up again on the day they had agreed to meet. They stood there together again. "He is gone," they said to each other, and they began to fight again, dragging each other around by the hair. "Come, let us hunt for him again," they said. Then one said, "I will go down after him," and the other said, "I will go up." Again they agreed to spend four days at it, and to meet on the fifth day. Then one of them disappeared into the earth, and the other disappeared into the sky.

They were gone for four days, and then on the day when they had agreed to meet, they returned. Once again they did not find him. Then one of them went back from there. She went up to that pond, and right there was that medium-sized baidarka lying overturned. She took off running, yelling, "Those people far off are the ones we have been hunting for!" Then the two of them went into the house [of the woman who had rescued him]. "Why have you taken our husband from us?" they said. They attacked her. When they began to fight with her, she pushed them together so that they were fighting with each other. While they fought with each other, the couple were just laughing at them, because they were really funny. Finally the woman got angry. She finished them off. She put them into the fire. And after that, they lived there, winter and summer. And that is the end of this story.
