THE BLIND MAN'S STORY

Note: Chapman (p. 50) notes: "This story is from the Kuskokwim River.

Such stories, according to the narrator, are told in camp, and bring success in hunting." Chapman's title for the story is "Story of a Young Man who was Purified from Sin."

There was a village. There were two young men who lived there, and they were chiefs. Now this was a big village where they lived. And they hunted for game. Now these two young men had not yet found wives, so they lived there by themselves. As was their custom, one of them always went to sleep early, and the other one went to bed later. Then in the morning, when it began to get light, the one who had gone to bed later got up and took his arrows, and went up on the mountain. He shot caribou and skinned them. Then he went back into the kashim. He found that his partner was gone. After he had been there for a little while, his partner came back. "Well," he said, "you came back, friend?"

"Yes, I came back here," said the other.

"Okay, we'll build a fire," he said. So they split some wood, then they opened the curtain. Then their food was brought in in bowls and they busied themselves with that. Afterwards they sat down, in the middle of the kashim where they always sat. The other young men, their cousins, went back to their own houses where they usually stayed, but the two young men themselves did not go back to their own houses.

Then the one who always fell asleep first, went to sleep. And the one who had fallen asleep later the day before sat up. The one who fell asleep later, it is said, shone at night. He just did that. It was because he always tried to control his anger. But his partner did not shine, his partner who went to sleep. After a long time, the second man also fell asleep for a little while. And then as it was beginning to get light, he awoke and got dressed. Then he went back up on the mountain. He climbed all the way up the mountain, where he had always gone when he was a child.

Then he looked around. He saw no caribou where he usually got caribou. He looked both ways, but there were no caribou. Meanwhile, it grew light.

He looked both ways. Over toward the river there was a broad expanse of tundra. On the other side, where the mountains were, the sun was about to rise. Then he saw something out in the middle of the big tundra. It was a nice house, with the curtain blowing outward. He looked again, but there was nothing there.

So then the young man thought, "I should go there." So he put down his arrows and his pack, and went down there below. He arrived there. It was a very nice house. He went into the doorway, and he looked around outside. He looked around, but there was no cache. He looked for a trail, but there were no people's tracks. Then he thought. He thought, "I wonder where the people are?" Then he entered the house. He went down into the entryway. He pushed aside the curtain. There was a sudden burst of light. Then he entered. The house was quite small; he went across to the other side. And over on the riverward side of the house, a woman was sitting on the shelf, a very pretty woman. And she was sewing. She did not glance around. Then she put down her sewing in front of her, and she spoke out, saying, "Good, you have come this way on account of my wisdom. I looked all over the world, but I didn't see anyone. On all the world, I only caught sight of you. Since you seem good to me, I have shown you my house," she said. Then the woman went out. She was gone a long time. And then she came back in. She brought him a fine, clean bowl, and it was steaming; the food had just been dished out. And he began to eat it. Then he gave the bowl back to her. She was gone for a moment, then came back in. She brought in thick back sections of caribou skins and went across to him with them. Then she said to him, "All right, you lie on this." He took it from her and put it on the shelf. She also gave him a marten-skin blanket for his bedding. So he lay down. They went to bed. In the morning, they awoke. For two days and two nights he stayed in her house and never looked outside. Then, when they were getting up, she went out. She brought in meat and again she gave him food. They spent the day there again. And when it got dark again, the man said to her, "Will I only stay here in the house?" "Yes," she replied. And then the man said, "How long will I only stay in the house?" "Why, what do you lack, that you speak thus?" she said. "You have already become a part of my life." Then she gave him food. They finished eating, and then they went to bed. The young man stayed awake. Across from him the woman was about to go to sleep. And then the young man thought, "Perhaps I will always stay here in this way." Then he thought again, "Why did she reveal this house of hers to me?" And he thought, "I should go over to her." Then he arose. And as he crossed the house and went in front of her, he suddenly lost consciousness. Right in front of her he went, and there it happened. He could not tell where he was. Then it was as if he woke up. And then he sat back down in the house. Then he thought, "What am I doing here? What is she doing to me here?" And he thought, "I thought I was going over to her, but it seems I was asleep." Meanwhile, the woman snored over on the other side. He thought again, "I wonder what I'm doing here. I think I'll go over again." And so he got up again. And when he reached the place where her head lay once more, once more he lost consciousness. It was as if he was asleep. Then once again it was as if he awoke. And he lay in his place and came to his senses. "I wonder why it seemed as if I went across to where she lies?" And he thought, "Ah, what am I doing here?" Meanwhile, the woman across the room continued to sleep. "Now I wonder what's happening to me? I think I'll try again," he thought. So he went back to her again. He went up to the bed where her head lay. Then all of a sudden the back of the house opened up in the middle! He became frightened! Suddenly it became very light, shining brightly. Then someone laughed, and when he turned around, there was a woman, back in the clean place, laughing at him. Then the woman said, "What are you doing? Why, that is my mother," she said. Then the man became ashamed. "Come here," she said, and he went to her. And then the woman spoke to him: "Now because you seemed good to my mother, she revealed this house of ours to you." And then she brought him in, and undressed him, and left him naked. Then she put warm water by him, and fat, which she cut into pieces. (That is what she used for soap.) Then she bathed him. Then she gave him clothing, she dressed him in fine clothes. And after she dressed him, she told him, "Now, sit down." Then she told him, "Give me your hand." So he held out his hand to her, and she took it. She put it in her mouth. She started sucking on his hand. Finally the woman's mouth was full. She spit the water from her mouth into the basin. She did that twice. Then she put his foot in her mouth. When her mouth was full, she spit the water into the basin. She did that twice also. Then she said to him, "Look here." And he looked. The water looked just like charcoal in it. And then the woman said, "This is the evil that you have done since the time you grew up. Look at your sins here." And the man said, "Yes. All right." He said, "Now you have made me all right. Now I am very thankful to you." Then the man put all the things he had worn into the water where he had been washed. She started to take it out. "Empty it far away," he said. So she went far away with it. Then she dumped it out. She also threw away the bowl it was in. Then she went back inside. She gave him food and he ate. Then the woman married him, and he began to live there with her. Then she told him, "Look well around my house." So he looked around, and it was very fine. There were skins upon the earthen floor--the house was full of them. That woman was a very rich person. The man said to the woman, "How have you managed to do this?" And the woman replied, "Well, I will not tell you about it yet. Eventually you will find out." And so he stayed there with her. All the time he stayed with her, he did not see outside. Whatever he ate was already cooked. Meanwhile, the mother stayed in a house nearby. She went out and brought in cooked food. That was how they lived. Finally, his wife bore a child. It was a boy. And they raised him. Finally he began to walk around. And then the man said, "Am I always to live here in this way?"

Then the woman said, "What would you do, that you speak this way?" "How long will I stay just in the house?" he said. And the woman replied, "There is nothing lacking here that you can get by working, so why say that?" That was all she told him. So they continued to live there. And after a long time had passed, the woman said, "Now I will show you where I get such riches. Now, come," she said to him. And he went to her. He went out with her. They went to the back of the house, in the middle, and the ground opened up. "Now look down below," she told him. He stooped and looked down. Down where he looked, there were many animals; down in the earth, a great many. "Do you see them?" she asked. And her husband said, "Yes." Then she slammed the door shut. And they went back into their house. Then the man thought to himself, "This must surely be the reason for what happened where I used to go hunting, why there were no caribou where I always used to get caribou." He thought this, and then his wife said, "What evil things are you thinking to yourself?" Then she said to her husband, "Now ever since the time when you first came here, I have seen all your thoughts." Then the woman said, "Because you seemed good to us, we revealed our house to you." And then the man said, "I am thinking about my dear parents, wondering whether they are still alive." "Well," said his wife, "four seasons have passed since you came here." "What?" he said,

"It seemed that I have stayed here only four nights." "That is because you did not know that a year's time had passed outside," she said. "Right now the fifth season is passing. It is now nearly winter, as it was when you came to us." "What?" he said. "How could I know that, since I never see outside?" "Do you want to look outside?" she said. "Go on, go outside." And so he went outside, and looked around. Indeed, autumn was passing. And then he went back into the house, and said, "I should go find out about my parents." "Yes," she said to him. "Go on, tomorrow, early in the morning, go and get wood to make a sled." So early the next morning he got up and went to get material for a sled. And he got it quickly and brought it back to the settlement. Then he did nothing but carve. He brought back the wood for the sled and carved it quickly. He finished it the next day. Then the next day his wife said to him, "I should go with you, too." "If you want to," he said. So he loaded up his sled, and put his wife and baby in it. Then the man said, "I wonder if perhaps she does not like going among humans?" And his wife's mother answered, "I don't know. Spend only four days there." He agreed. And then she said further, "When you two come down to the village, be careful of the one who used to be your partner. Be careful of him. If she [wife] tells you there is danger, something evil, heed that warning. Otherwise you will do wrong," she said. "Your wife is not accustomed to human society. She is not an earthly person at all. Now when you leave from this house, be sure to look back for the house," she said to him. And then the two of them left. They also put their little child in the sled. Then they left, with the husband pulling the sled and his wife pushing it. Then they looked back for their house, and behold, it had disappeared. Down below there they camped. The next day they went on. And then the village came in sight. The young men of the village were saying, "They are bringing back the one who was lost!" They shouted, those people of the village. And then they arrived at the village; they went up. And then they went to that man's mother. Saying "My child," they hugged him. They hugged his wife, too. Those people there were ready to do anything for them out of love for them. His mother made "ice cream" for them. And then the woman said to her husband, "I am not accustomed to being among humans." Evening came. They went to bed. "Sleep here with my mother," he told her. "My cousin has asked me to stay with him down in the kashim." But his wife did not want to let him go. "But I want to stay down there," he told her, her husband. Finally she said, "Do as you wish." And he took his bedroll and went down into the kashim. Then he lay down beside his cousin, head to head with him, in the center of the kashim. They talked to each other all night, telling each other what had happened. Then the one who had remained at home said, "Go over there to my wife, and I too will go to your wife." But the good man said, "Well, the one I stay with is not of earthly people." But the other said, "Go on." "Oh no," said the first man. However, the other kept saying, "Go on." Finally he said, "All right, if you want to." So the man who had stayed in the village went to the other man's wife, and the one who had left went to his cousin's wife also. The man who had stayed in the village crept into the entrance of the house [where the unearthly woman was sleeping]. He went up to her and lay beside her in the bed, and then he pushed her. The woman became really frightened when he touched her. And then she was gone! Then he went back out. He went into his own house. When his cousin came in, he told him what had happened. Right away, the husband put on his parka and went out, and went to his mother's house. He looked for his wife, but she was gone. Immediately he started running back. When it got light, someone said that his wife must have gone back, because her tracks were there. There was the place where she had blown her nose, for she apparently had been crying as she went back. Then sadness came upon her husband. He returned to his village. He went inside. And when he entered the entryway of the kashim, right there his feet became stuck. [This was in the village where he had lived with his wife, not in his parents' village.] There was no way he could get free! "Now, that is why I told you what I did," said his wife's mother. "Be quiet! Let me in!" he said. But she said, "No." And then he started to cry without ceasing. While he cried, a night passed, and a day. Finally his feet became loose. He tried to go into the entryway again, and once again his feet got stuck. "Please, let me in," he said. "Oh no, I will not let you in," she said. "If you never more look down toward the river, I will let you in. You will never see your mother and your father any more. Only then will I let you in. You have done very badly by me. Because of you, my child is unhappy. But since I have pity on you, I will let you in." And then she let him in. He went inside to his wife. There she was, with her tears flowing. And she said to her husband, "Why have you come back here? Who was that woman you went to? I wonder if you mean to stay with her?" Then the man said, "Did I do that of my own accord, that you should say that to me?" And then he began to live there with them again. He never went anywhere else, he only stayed there. The mother concealed the house again. And year after year, that man never returned to his own mother. And so the story is finished.
